the construction of an internally pressurized tube. The invention relates in particular to the construction of a gastight, completely leak-tight pipe or tube through which a liquid medium flows under pressure, for example a gastight hose. The gastightness and the tightness of such tubes are not only to be ensured, but also maintained over a longer period of time, in particular when such pipes or tubes are used for carrying out chemical reactions at elevated temperatures, in particular in distillation columns. In these cases, the pipes or tubes have to withstand mechanical forces which occur in the region of the reaction medium, in particular temperatures up to 350.degree. C. In the case of gastight pipes or tubes which are to be used under these conditions, it is known to use tubular insulations which are lined with, for example, plastic. Such pipes or tubes, however, are relatively expensive to produce. It is moreover not possible to ensure that the desired tightness and gastightness are maintained over a relatively long period of time with such pipes or tubes.
